Bound copies of report

When you produce a multi-page brochure, book, or report, you need to know how the final product will be bound before you set up the document in the page layout program and start working. You can choose from several mandatory methods, each with its pros and cons depending on the purpose of the document, the need for durability, the best appearance and price. Some connection methods require fixes to be made to a digital file to accommodate the connection process. Some types of binding require only that the fields are wide enough to accommodate the holes for three rings of binder or spiral binding. For a seam in a saddle, you or your printer may need to compensate for crawling. Some bindings provide greater durability; others allow your book to lie flat when it's open. Your options are more limited if you want to do it yourself, instead of using a local printer for connection and finishing, and you'll need to add to the price of special equipment.

3-ring binding - This is a good connection option for some types of guides, where page corrections may need to be inserted periodically. This method is the simplest for the stand-alone, because it requires only good quality of the 3-ring hole. Documents that will be 3-rings usually require a particularly wide margin on the side of the document where the holes are located.

Comb, Bobby, Wire Binding - Notebooks, notebooks, steno, cookbooks, brochures, manuals, reference materials, workbooks and calendars often use plastic combs, coil or two-wire wheat connection methods. Until connecting to the 3 rings, this is the most accessible method for linking a brochure or report. The process is not difficult, but requires the purchase of a special binder to insert combs or coils. Unless you have many brochures, the cost of the equipment will be more expensive than the cost of paying a printing press to tie the brochures for you.

Thermal binding - Thermal connection provides a strong connection with a clean appearance and allows the documents to open flat. You can use this method with or without covers. Thermal connection must be carried out by a printing company or a professional printing works. This may not require any correction of your document, but it is best to check the folder to confirm this.

Saddle seams - a saddle seam is common for small brochures, calendars, pocket address books and some magazines. The staples used in this process are an industrial force and are often part of a machine that folds and matches the pages of the brochure, sews and cuts it off. If you print your booklet at home, you can sew it to a printing company. If the brochure has many pages, crawling becomes a problem. Creep is difficult to determine on the home desktop because the image area of each set of pages as you approach the center of the should be moved slightly to the connection side. How much depends on the thickness of the paper used.

Perfect binding - Novels with paper upholstery are an example of perfectly connected books. Books, phonebooks, and some magazines use perfect connection. You will need to consult a local connection company to acquire a perfect connection. This binding method usually doesn't require any changes to the digital file, but it will cost you more than most other required methods, except in cases that are required.

Case Binding - Tying a case or edition is the most common type of binding for hardcover books. This type of connection requires the services of professional binder or commercial printer and is not suitable for do-it-yourself. Contact the folder for information about special requirements for your digital file. The type of binding you choose depends on the purpose of the document and on your budget. Discuss the appropriate method of connecting with your customer (if applicable) and your printer before starting a project. Your choice of binding not only affects the design and layout of your project, but also affects the final print costs. Discussion in General Discussion started by czech, August 30, 2011.
